MANAGER'S COMMENT

Sometimes, it is possible to obtain an equity-level return while only having to support bond-level risk. This is exactly what happened last month with the investment in the convertible bond issued by Inmarsat.

Inmarsat received, and consequently the board recommended to shareholders, an all-cash offer by a private equity consortium led by Apax Partners. Apax Partners was offering USD 7.21 per share to take the company private. This represented a premium of more than 25% on the last closing price.

The convertible bond issued by Inmarsat had a so-called "ratchet clause". This clause included in the prospectus for the bond adjusts the conversion ratio in case of a change of control in the company. As such, 1 bond with a nominal value of USD 200,000 can be converted into an estimated 43,134 shares after the company is taken over, as opposed to 14,915 shares before the take-over bid.

In other words, the fund benefited from the same return on the convertible bond as the shareholders on the equity, but while only being a creditor of the company. This feature is not standard in convertible bond prospectuses, but when present it can be very beneficial to investors in case of a change in control.
